Student Gets Around

A student is moving out of town and will no longer attend the local technical college. This is good news because he's accused of harassing a classmate. The harassment occurred both on and off campus. The victim reported this harassment to college staff. Now other students are coming forward and making statements about this student's behavior. It seems this student has a pattern of befriending other students and then making inappropriate advances. When victims decline his advances he quickly turns to angry harassment of the student.

...and a second version...

A student harasses instructors. He makes threats to instructors and uses verbally abusive language. One staff member filed a harassment complaint against him.

In both cases it is learned that this student has moved to the neighboring district and will be enrolling at the other district's technical college in the Fall.

Please answer the following questions:

- How do colleges follow the law yet try to do their best to prevent what appears to be a pattern for this student?
- What is the board's role here?

(This is a fictional scenario used as part of a group learning activity on Keeping Students and Staff Safe on Campus)
